RICKY AYANDA DYALOYI

(b. 1974 Gugulethu, Cape Town)

Ricky Dyaloyi's oeuvre has its roots in the Thupelo programme – a workshop that encouraged artistic growth by exchanging ideas, experiences, techniques and disciplines within a shared space or studio. The programme started in the 1980s in Johannesburg and later was brought to Cape Town in the 1990s.

Dyaloyi's imagery and thematics evolved concurrently with South Africa's first democratic elections – a momentous period in South Africa's history when there was an influx of discourse and exchange between all South African artists in the country. Dyaloyi's style of painting reflects ordinary citizens going about their daily lives, rendered in heightened colours to reveal the effervescent quality of the community and people with whom he lives. With an uncanny determination, Dyaloyi aims to unravel the simple mysteries of the human condition through his medium of choice: oil paint.

Dyaloyi continues to explore the unerring dynamism and apparently indomitable spirit of everyday citizens in urban South Africa. "Each piece visually narrates the diverse stories of survival, from overcoming marginalization to embracing hope," he explains. His paintings serve as both homage and exhortation to the workers, commuters, the street vendors, that surge through his canvases, at once legion and yet individually depicted and dignified by his hand.

Dyaloyi's genius is his ability to see how the trees make up the wood. The individuals in his multitudes are teased out just enough for us to recognise each figure as both idiosyncratic and archetypal. Because he relays stories about everyday resilience and endurance being the sum of a people's constituent parts, all the protagonists get equal treatment and have equal significance. As if to amplify this, Dyaloyi paints portraits which, juxtaposed with his crowd scenes, invite us to zoom in and single out people in the crowd, and recognise or imagine each of their unique contributions to the story.

"Through these visual narratives," Dyaloyi comments, "I explore the shared human spirit that persists, adapts, and thrives – an artistic ode to the daily perseverance that guides us toward a better tomorrow."

Everard Read presented Dyaloyi's work at Expo Chicago in 2025 and 2024, and 1:54 Contemporary African Art Fair in London in 2015, and his work was spotlighted at the same fair in 2018 by Spier Arts Trust. Everard Read published a monograph on Dyaloyi in 2016 and an essay on the artist is included in Ashraf Jamal's In The World: Essays on Contemporary South African Art, published in 2017.
